FOREGROUND

22 NOW Timothy A. Schuler, Editor

Money for Utah's dwindling Great Salt Lake; glass plus urban greenery can spell doom for birds; Arcosanti's experimental legacy extends into the landscape; the main reason midcareer women leave design firms, and more.

44 CLIMATE

The Breakup by Carol Becker

Carbon capture looks different on a historic farm estate, where the Scottish National Trust is slicing through human-made earthworks to uncheck the natural wetlands and involving local farmers in the transformation.

FEATURES

66 Listen and Unlearn by Zach Mortice

The Navajo Nation stretches across four state lines and thousands of years of environmental history, but in Round Rock, Arizona, those numbers don't add up to basic services or a local grocery store. Working with the Indigenous Design + Planning Institute, University of New Mexico graduate students take tentative steps toward a planning process that rewrites landscape architecture practice.

82 The Sedge Insurgency by Bradford McKee

Versatile, hardy, and increasingly available, the 2,000 species of the genus Carex are enjoying a moment in the sun. Fans of the humble sedge praise its drought tolerance and adaptability to climate flux, declaring that there truly is one (at least) for most every landscape.

THE BACK

104 The Age of the Mega-Eco Project by Robert Levinthal and Richard Weller

While the era of ever-larger hard infrastructure solutions grinds on, a new typology has begun to emerge. Mega-eco projects attack multiple challenges with landscape-based strategies and offer enormous opportunities—if they avoid the cost run-ups and policy missteps of traditional infrastructure projects.

118 BOOKS Mimi Zeiger, Editor

The Rule Book by Gale Fulton, ASLA

A review of 250 Things a Landscape Architect Should Know, edited by B. Cannon Ivers.

148 BACKSTORY

Prop Roots Design Studio's oversized topiary is a balancing act in Surat, India.
